“ I worked across the room from Brian at City Pages for years and kept up a bantering acquaintance with him, but it was through the fantasy baseball league we both belonged to that I got to know Brian and count him a friend. Beneath a pretty gentle, unassuming exterior, he was one of the most naturally curious, opinionated and insightful people I knew. Also one of the most impassioned, whether the subject was politics or baseball or his increasingly emphatic embrace of atheist writings the past few years. Brian always made the world around him a more interesting place, and I can't quite believe he's gone.
