“ I remember the first time I saw her. They had come for a visit to the farm and there was this tiny little slip of a girl peeking around the legs of my Uncle Greg, her dark eyes taking everything in. She was a little shy, but the excitement of being thrown into our big boisterous family didn't take long to draw her out. Soon we were running through the house and barnyard like she'd always been one of us. She was a city girl in awe of the cows and chickens, but not afraid to get dirty. What had become commonplace and routine to us began to look different when we saw them through her eyes.

My favorite memory is from when we were tweens. Carrie loved the pickles my mom canned each year and we had a basement full of them so whenever the Sauers came to visit, we would sneak down there and eat a jar or two. This particular day, we came across a jug of my dad's homemade dandelion wine and helped ourselves to that too. We were down there for a while eating and drinking to our hearts content.

I don't remember what our parents said to us when we came up from the basement schnoekered (I probably blocked it out), but they were not happy with us. I suspect I got in more trouble because I should have known better. I should have, but Carrie and I laughed about that for years and that was totally worth it. To this day, I can't open a jar of homemade pickles without thinking of Carrie; it brings a smile to my face every time.

I'm going to miss you more than you know, cousin. I love you. Rest in peace.
