“ I was crestfallen to hear of the loss of Mr. Sedio. At Edison High School his name was extremely important to some, Sedio becoming an important noun. While he was reputed to be able to protect himself, (and to be quite tough) he never was aggressive toward anyone. I was amazed and thrilled to bump into him at the U of M. I never knew his family at all, he seemed to be a personage that could stand by himself. I was fortunate to fall in with some people at the 'U' and it allowed me to achieve a great deal, but much less than Darryl did. I was fortunate to come from a working class family that had a tendency to receive degrees and diplomas but I never knew of the background 'Sedio' had. He was amazing, while others like myself worked so very hard for grades, Darryl seemed he could outdistance us without really trying at all. While I needed a group of friends to achieve any distinction, Darryl seemed so able to merely depend on himself. Hearing of his further interests and career makes a great deal of sense.

If there were anyone I would want to parpttern myself after, it would be him. There is a hole left by the loss of someone in my own class ('66 while Darryl was in class of '65) there will be a hole left by his loss. His loss makes me bereft.
